From the 1870s to the 1990s Canada, often in partnership with leading church organizations, operated a residential school system that targeted Indigenous children. These schools were designed to separate children from their families and assimilate them into Euro-Canadian culture. The purpose was to destroy their Indigenous culture, language, and traditions. The policy was referred to as "cultural genocide," and the Indian Residential Schools Settlement Agreement was established to address the harms caused by this policy.